Southeastern PA's Regional Education Partnership

Delaware County Community College, Community College of Philadelphia and Montgomery County Community College have joined forces to create a regional partnership in Applied Engineering Technology (AET). Each institution offers different programs leading either to a certificate or an associate degree in a variety of engineering technology related programs. Upon examining the offerings from each institution, you may be interested in attending a community college outside of your county, if they offer study in the field that matches your interest.

If you do, here is some information that you need to know...

Shared Agreements

Each of the colleges in the AET Partnership have "Shared Agreements." This means that if the engineering technology program you are interested in is on the "Shared List" for a partner school, you can attend that program, at the in-county tuition rate. The list of programs can be found in your local community college's catalog. Contact the Admissions department for more information.

PA TRAC – Your online transfer tool.

Using a new available online tool, you can take your general education courses related to your program of interest at your local community college and transfer these courses to the partner school that offers your ultimate program of choice. This tool will assist you in deciding which general education courses you should take that will be accepted at the receiving institution. PA TRAC (www.patrac.org), allows you to self-guide your selection of general education classes, so that you know what you take at your local community college. Remember, it's always wise to consult a Transfer Advisor at your local AET Partnership community college when planning your educational path.
